AutoCAD is designed for drafting and technical illustration. It is used in many industries, including architectural, civil, construction, mechanical, and manufacturing. Civil and architectural customers use AutoCAD mostly for preparing architectural and civil drawings. In January 2016, Autodesk acquired Simplify3D. This was Autodesk's only CAD application, and was released as AutoCAD 360 in 2013. AutoCAD 360 allows access to all AutoCAD drawing functions, using the same drawing project and design documentation. The advantages of AutoCAD include: Easy-to-use interface and wide availability of industry-standard licenses. The integration of large databases of CAD drawings for making revisions. AutoCAD has a powerful 2D-to-3D conversion capability. A wide variety of pre-designed styles and templates. Real-time collaboration with other AutoCAD users. Drawing and editing of 3D objects. Scanned and scanned images can be imported. Design center for rapid access to standard building blocks. Protected work spaces for enforcing security and confidentiality. Design plugins for specialized applications. AutoCAD is also a successor to the original Microstation, MicroCAD, and MicroDraw products. Features The Autodesk Group's Autodesk software development and licensing business is organized into several divisions that provide AutoCAD and other programs and products. These Autodesk divisions include: • AutoCAD. This application is used for architectural and drafting purposes. • Fusion 360. This year, we've been told that it's now being rolled out to the general public for pre-orders and will begin shipping later this year. In the program, you'll earn points for things like visiting a theater, buying tickets, and of course, downloading the application. The more of these things you do in a day, the more points you'll accumulate, and those can be redeemed for prizes like a gym membership, tickets to the theater, or even the privilege of flying with Virgin America. The program isn't without controversy, though. On one side, you'll find the consumer groups that are worried about how companies are going about collecting their
